Este juego también se baila en la región de la Costa Atlántica.

En este juego un grupo canta la canción y otro grupo baila. Los bailarines se visten todo de negro y tienen una cinta negra en la cabeza.

Se ponen en un círculo con dos bailarines en el centro. Uno de estos tiene un trapo en la boca, como una tripa de vaca; el otro trata de sacarle el trapo de la boca con sus dientes. Pero si el otro no puede quitarle el trapo, los dos pelean y pelean hasta que al final lo quita. Hacen una pelea en el baile como hacen los zopilotes cuando comen una tripa de vaca.

Los demás en el círculo se quedan vigilando y bailando, pero en un momento todos entran en el baile para quitarle el trapo de la boca. Todos bailan, peleando como zopilotes, hasta que termina la música.

Uno de los jugadores sale ganando cuando los otros no le pueden arrancar el trapo.

Era un hombre bajo, manco, con el pelo negro lacio, no muy gordo ni muy flaco. Siempre andaba muy sucio.

A este hombre le gustaba visitar las casas donde hacían fiestas; bailaba y movía todas las partes de su cuerpo. A todo el mundo le gustaba reirse al ver sus movimientos, y siempre gozaban mucho.

Pero, según dicen, cuando Simian no aparecía en una fiesta, la gente preguntaba por él. Todos lo querían mucho, y cuando murió, en las fiestas cantaban como Simian, imitando sus costumbres y moviendo todas las partes del cuerpo.

Esta canción es del río Coco, pero ahora se canta en toda esta región. El baile es así: los que van a jugar se ponen en dos filas, y se ponen frente a frente. El que está adelante comienza a cantar; con la música y las palabras mueve todo el cuerpo. Los demás que tiene en frente hacen lo mismo que él. Pero en un momento todos cantan y bailan, hasta que termina la canción.

all schools with an English-speaking student body. In each successive year it is to extend to an additional grade: in 1987 to second grade, in 1988 to third grade, in 1989 to fourth grade. In second grade Spanish as a second language is to be added to the curriculum, but teaching and textbooks for all classes –social studies, math, etc.– will be in English through fourth grade.

The planners intend to make the program bicultural as well as bilingual, "which would not simply mean translation of the Spanish textbooks into English –we are convinced that we need our own textbooks," says Ray Hooker, who has participated from the beginning in the development of the project. The idea is to teach with examples from Creole culture and experience. According to Ronald Brooks, research and discussion with parents will be carried out in the communities and neighborhoods in order to determine what vocabulary, ways of life, and economic conditions to present in the textbooks.

Teachers and technical workers are being trained in workshops sponsored variously by the Regional Government, the central MED, and the Autonomous National University of Nicaragua (UNAN). Many of the educational materials for the program will be printed in the zone using equipment supplied by the West German government.

How do parents and teachers feel about bilingual education? The teachers are "ecstatic" about it, according to Ray Hooker. Creole parents see language as important in the opportunities available to their children in the future. Although generally only

One of the main motivations for promoting bilingual education in English and Spanish was the high drop-out rate and low academic level of students.

Creole is spoken in Creole homes, "the parents want their children to learn Spanish also, they see that it's an advantage," observes Ray. As for English in the schools, "there you have the parents wanting and insisting on standard English; if you tried to conduct classes in Creole you'd have a political uproar on your hands."

Standard vs. Creole English

This attitude of the parents reflects an awareness that knowing standard English opens opportunities. It has meant having access to a world beyond the boundaries of the Coast or even the nation.

In Ray Hooker's mind, English language skills are a valuable unexploited resource whose development would benefit not only Costeños but the whole country:

In the area of the world where we live, knowledge of English is an advantage for us in many situations. The country needs lots of speakers of English, lots of writers of English. For example, with translation most translators are people from abroad; there's a definite lack of people who handle the language. Our diplomats need to know English, the people who conduct our foreign trade must know English well. Also, the most modern technical books are first published in English before being published in any other language. So to know English is definitely an advantage.

Hooker visualizes having a very good program for the training of people to really utilize English in different spheres. "Practically all the teachers of English of the country could probably be best trained in South Zelaya. Many of the diplomats could be immersed in the area for a certain amount of time, a year, six months, and they would learn to handle the language." There has been some informal talk among education activists in ZEII about the possibility of establishing a school of higher education in English, for translation, teacher training, etc.

Nonetheless the subject is not without differences of opinion. Some people involved in the discussion argue that to teach standard English would be to impose an alien language and culture on the students, as is happening now with Spanish. Others go further and maintain that it would be a surrender to cultural domination by historic oppressors. Included in both views is the concern that the Creole language and culture would be implicitly undervalued

On the other hand, it appears that most people with an opinion on the issue are arguing that the two languages variations are not so different, that it is relatively easy for a Creole-speaker to learn standard English, and that the advantages of knowing standard English are too great to pass up. Ray Hooker, for example, sees no contradiction in knowing both forms of English:

For me the important thing is going to be that you're going to train people not to be ashamed but to be proud that they are speakers of Creole, that they are Creole. Creole is definitely not going to disappear, people are going to have both Creole and standard English and they'll know that they must learn standard English as a means to future achievements in the wider world in which they must become involved.

As long as the conditions exist in which Creoles can become proficient in standard English without undervaluing their ethnic identity as Creoles, there will be a correspondence rather than a conflict between expressing this identity and enjoying economic and political opportunity. The possibilities look good for incorporating standard English in a gentle way: written educational materials will be in standard English while mostly Creole will be spoken in the classroom.

"It's beautiful to speak Creole, but it's intelligent to know standard English."

Autonomy

Ronald Brooks, head of the regional MED, doesn't see that regional autonomy would change the plans for bilingual education very much. "We already had quite a lot of autonomy, Managua hasn't interfered," he claims. "But yes, the bilingual education program fits well with the autonomy project. It had to be done anyway; now it will be aided by the autonomy process. We just got a little bit of a jump on autonomy."

Ray Hooker, on the other hand, perceives more resistance from the national level, which would be countered by greater regional autonomy:

We didn't get much support from the national level; bilingual education is something which we've basically had to insist upon. basically had to insist upon. They don't understand the situation, and because they don't understand it, I imagine they have certain phantoms in their mind, telling them that this is a separatist project and so forth. The mere fact that we're working on this autonomy now will, I think, diminish their resistance to this project. In fact, this should become one of the most important projects of an autonomous government.

In conclusion, the bilingual-bicultural education program of ZEII, particularly in the context of regional autonomy, emphasizes the worth of the Creole language and culture while also recognizing the practicality of teaching standard English.

As Ray Hooker puts it, "It's beautiful to speak Creole, but it's intelligent to know standard English, in terms of survival in the rest of the country and outside of the country."
